

THREE FRIENDS OF COLLEGE DAYS MEET

Three former freshmen of the University of Minnesota, members of the same class, met by accident at the corner of Center and Adams streets at noon yesterday. Two of them were out of town and infrequent visitors to Phoenix. One was Hovad A. Smith, another Cleve W. Van Dyke of Miami, and the third was Judge E. W. Lewis. There was another member of the class who might have completed the quartette, Ira J. Johnson, but he did not happen along.

Mr. Smith described his first experience as Warwick, when he became spokesman for Mr. Van Dyke as candidate for the class presidency. He had labored alone on his nominating speech and he believed that he had made it an irrefutable appeal. Perhaps it would have been but at the close of it, after he had presented the name of his candidate, "Mr. Van Dyke of Alexandria," an irreverent freshman inquired, "And who in hell is Mr. Van Dyke of Alexandria?"

Another candidate was elected. The lack of discrimination in the choice was later brought out in the fact that the class had inadvertently elected a sophomore.

Mr. Smith is on his way to West Florida and will return to his home in Risbee in about ten days. Mr. Van Dyke is engaged in the stimulation of a good road movement designed to connect Miami with a larger town, meaning thereby no disparagement to Globe, with which Miami is already connected.

CRIME MEANS A CITY'S DECAY

Fifty male citizens of Isabel have signed an agreement to purchase no more bootleg whisky. It should be understood, however, that the people of Isabel are trying to rid the town of bootleggers, and not trying to bring the price down "for Christmas." (Clarksville Times.)

Every citizen who buys bootleg liquor is violating and procuring the violation of the law. In setting an example of lawlessness to the lawless, the citizen who becomes a victim of lawlessness has himself partly to blame for his misfortune. There are substantial men, family men, property men, men upon whom rest serious responsibilities in the way of standing for law and order and the protection of social and property rights, who flagrantly violate the prohibition law by patronizing lawbreakers that traffic in contraband liquor.

When supposedly good citizens consume at or participate in the violation of the liquor laws in a community, it is not long until that community becomes known as a lawless "paradise." The result is that the town loses caste in the estimation of better class outsiders. Property values decline and the moral atmosphere becomes almost visibly contaminated. Then disaster sets in. If a town in the United States wishes to commit suicide, it has only to become known as a resort for criminals and low-brows and moribund police officers and death will soon come to its relief—either actual death or slow strangulation.

All this means that if the people in this country who have most at stake are desirous of protecting their interests, as well as their families and all the better institutions of our civilization, it is time for them to stand out against the element which is determined to peddle whisky. If the prohibition law shall be allowed to become a force it will go far toward proving what the enemies of republicanism have long maintained is true, that republicanism can not decently govern themselves.—Dallas News.

The yearly sales approximate $135,000. The stock is new hardware, new and used furniture, and goods of great variety. This is not a forced sale, but a sale, or a sale, or a sale. Don't bother me unless you can command money or bank securities. The stock was bought for cash, and not a dollar stands against it. The business will be continued, whether I sell or remain.

"UNCLE JOE" POPULAR AS EVER

Cannon has blown back to Washington, full of fight and ready for a hard season. His left wrist, which he broke during the campaign by falling on it, and not, as reported, by falling on his famous south-paw gesture, still is giving him a little trouble.

The former speaker had a hot fight in the primary campaign last summer, but he breezed in on election day by some twenty-five thousand votes.

One of the striking features of the former speaker's opposition was the fact that a woman relative of his opponent made a very active campaign canvassing them by telephone and such. Among others that the woman called by telephone were the servants in "Uncle Joe's" own house. Helen Cannon, the speaker's daughter, answered the phone, and the woman told her very plainly that she wanted to talk with the servants in behalf of Mr. Cannon's opponent. Miss Helen accommodated the caller by telling her to talk to the phone, and they got the "low down" on why "Uncle Joe" should not be returned to congress. But, apparently, they were not greatly impressed by it.—Cleveland Plain-Dealer.

A MIX-UP IN NAMES

Changing one's name in war times often leads to an amusing and often embarrassing post-war developments. During the war many Americans with German-sounding names, when charged with patriotic duties, sought the courts and obtained the right to wear the English-sounding equivalent. There are even instances where one brother did so and another did not. Daily in front of the Ritz-Carlton hotel stands a big yellow limousine with the initials of its owner largely emblazoned thereon. A policeman saw a man enter the car and drive off. "Who is that man?" he asked. The starter replied giving the English-sounding name of the owner. "But I was watching it for Mrs. ..." replied the policeman, questioning the German-sounding name of her husband. This fellow, not knowing of the name-shift, went to his patrol box and reported the motor car as missing. It took hours of telephoning, and a lot of explaining to straighten out the tangle that resulted.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

The Glendale Meat market had one of the best window displays ever seen in Glendale, or in the valley for that matter. Those responsible for this unique display were J. H.
